Unit 1 – My Page, the Beginning

I took some time to research how to make bullet points as a hierarchical layout within HTML; I aim to have the left-hand table of contents follow the user as they scroll down the page through each assignment. Clicking the links will advance them to that specific point. I will eventually migrate the site to GitHub, as I have used it before for previous classes. I am currently in a time crunch to accomplish the assignment due to deployment requirements, and GitHub was forcing me to change my password but also not allowing me to pass the Captcha check to do so. I will continue to troubleshoot and migrate my site to GitHub this week.

The following steps hopefully include learning to create a margin on the left-hand side that will move up and down with the user as they scroll through the page, much like the table of contents does on a standard Wikipedia page. For the assignments with forms, I have not decided whether to embed them in the main page or create links to them individually. I hope that as I progress through the course, I learn the ups and downs of each option. The page has a fundamental CSS style with very little modification. I want to modernize it and allow for soft borders and 3-dimensional aspects.
